China and Global Green Prosperity

The coming decade will be a pivotal time for a green global transition benefitting all nations while safeguarding planetary ecological boundaries. Global sustainable development accords are in place, green technology is progressing, and new partnerships are active including green investment. If ever there was a moment for enhanced international cooperation on environment and development, it is now.

China can share its hard-earned experience, and to expand its international cooperation on environment and development. Indeed, it is hard to imagine sufficient green global development progress without full commitment and leadership from China—even as it struggles with its own massive domestic environmental protection issues.

The signals are strong that China will press for an encompassing 'Ecological Civilization' strategy both nationally and globally. This will lead to an expanded role for China in global environment and development governance, with implications for other major shifts in global power balances.

In addition to IISD and CCICED, Art Hanson has worked with other Chinese and international organizations in China including: a CIDA-sponsored 5-year program on environment and sustainable development with the Central Party School system (2005-2009), IISD and DIFID programs with the Chinese Ministry of Commerce on greening of natural resource market supply chains, and a Stanford University initiative with Chinese institutions on sustainable fisheries management in China. He currently serves as the Co-chair of the Scientific Advisory Committee and as a member of the Steering Committee for the UNEP-International Ecosystem Management Program (IEMP) hosted by the Chinese Academy of Sciences.
